

300 WOMEN LEADERS IN GLOBAL HEALTH

In November 2014, Ilona Kickbusch, director of the Global Health Programme at the Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, launched a Twitter campaign aimed at showcasing female leadership in global health. Using the hashtag #WGH100, Twitter users sent nominations of women working at the forefront of global health from around the world. The 100 Women Leaders in Global Health list was published on December 15th, 2014 and enjoyed tremendous reach across social media. This profile was further increased when the Lancet published the feature “Twitter campaign highlights top women in global health”, which led to further nominations of female leaders to be included on such a list. The hashtag #WGH200 was created as a result and greatly surpassed its target, demonstrating the remarkable response in highlighting the work of women in this domain. In this expanded list, we have included the first 300 nominations compiled of the many women leaders nominated and among innumerable others working to promote global health. Going forward, we encourage this list’s participants, nominees, and audience to continue to recognise women leaders and ensure that this diversity is reflected in all discussions and decisions shaping global health.

The women listed are ordered alphabetically by surname with affiliations taken directly from Twitter profiles or third-party sources. Many women were nominated multiple times, though only the initial nominator is noted. An asterisk (*) denotes those who appeared on the original 100 Women in Global Health list. All Twitter usernames and bitly links are hyperlinked for easy reference.

“In health development, as in many other areas, women are agents of change. They are the driving force that creates better lives for families, communities and, increasingly, the countries they have been elected to govern. Every time a woman excels in a high-profile position, her achievement lifts the social status of women everywhere”

The Global Health Programme (GHP) is the Graduate Institute's research, training and capacity building programme focusing on global health governance and diplomacy. It is one of the first of its kind and it reflects the wider trend in both the practice and analysis of global health, which pays increasing attention to the links between health, foreign policy, trade and development.

The Global Health Programme builds capacity by engaging in research, knowledge translation and diffusion as well as by conducting extensive executive training in global health diplomacy for and with major stakeholders in Geneva and worldwide.

The Global Health Programme is also unique as a research institution integrated into an institute of international relations and development. It engages in applied research and provides academic and innovative analysis on health as a governance challenge.

“Highlighting the contribution of women in advancing global health helps to balance the picture and reinforces the universality of the cause. Since most health decisions globally are made by women, it’s particularly important to highlight their contribution and to showcase women as role models and exemplars.”

“Globally, women experience a disproportionate burden of disease and death due to inequities in access to basic health care, nutrition, and education. In the face of this disparity, it is striking that leadership in the field of global health is highly skewed towards men and that global health organizations neglect the issue of gender equality in their own leadership.”
